Google's QGroundControl is a collaborative project between NASA and Google. It's set up for controlling UAV's (Unmanned Aerial Vehicles) and also other robots, including LEGO's Mindstorms Set. With it, you're able to fly the drones using some of the drag & drop programming that the system has to offer. Once you create the path, you have the ability to use the same interface to create new sensors by clicking the green plus (+) sign. It's very useful for research as it lets you set up the sensors that you want to have on your drone, use it to fly over a particular area, and record your GPS coordinates, as well as the time and a number of other metrics that you might be interested in. Now there are 3 different VR companies operating, and they're all competing with each other for the consumer's $900. Time will tell if the Oculus, Vive and PSVR are able to keep up with future games and content as they develop more in-depth games and the need to make these experiences more accessible to the consumer. Even though they are all similar in many ways and are all developing with headsets, the different companies have taken different approaches to the games, and should we see a future in which the 3rd model with the best hardware will be the winner for VR? The rumor mill is bustling with different game concepts, and I think right now we should wait for the major game titles that will be coming out to make a final decision on the winner. Oculus's Rift Oculus has been the clear leader in VR with the first VR headset to be introduced to the public. As with most things Oculus, they have taken the cautious approach with the Rift and began by focusing on the games. They have a large library of their own titles and are a good deal cheaper than the Vive or PSVR, allowing them to get their games in people's hands. Oculus is currently working with developers to get games that are available on the Rift into the hands of the consumers, but they are not releasing any old games yet, with many games being developed by third-party developers and converted to VR. "QGroundControl provides an interface to control modern RC and GPS vehicles over WiFi, USB, or I2C-based protocols such as Bosch. It has an intuitive Graphical User Interface, a scripting language, and a package system. By default, it uses the OpenStreetMap database. A collection of utilities is available to display map tiles on the device, like QGIS." With Google putting together its Map Kit in Android, developers have actually found themselves running out of options to display map tiles. Fortunately, Google has now come up with a great remedy in the form of the Map Kit, which has been rolled out as a preview for the Android Developers Toolkit in the Beta program, and an API is also available for others. To take advantage of the SDK, developers will need an API Key as well as one if they want to use the static map tiles. This gets a bit trickier if you want to use dynamic maps, but there are ways to save energy in the process. Google provides some great documentation about that. If the SDK is still in beta, that may mean some parts and features are in the process of being finalized. The full releases will bring new material and features. But it does come with an SDK preview, and developers can start using the SDK today, March 8. Looking For More? The consequences of structural modifications to the piperazine moiety on the lipophilicity of salvinorin A, an amphibian-derived NK-1 receptor antagonist, were studied using reversed-phase HPLC. The results indicate that the alpha-methyl substitution at position N-5 of the piperazine moiety significantly increases the lipophilicity of the conformationally restricted analog, 2',6'-dihydroxy-5'-isopropyl-N-methylsalvinorin A (salvinorin B). In contrast, a primary aromatic amide or a longer amide chain at this position, as found in salvinorin A and salvinorin B, respectively, significantly decreases the lipophilicity. These results confirm the magnitude of the lipophilicity effects of structural modifications at the piper
