technique, was developed. This method was applied for the computational modeling of the surface energy of gold, silver, and copper nanoparticles (10-100 nm) using a model system of a planar surface in contact with a simulated bulk fluid. The first approximation in the new modeling technique was that of a planar surface. The second approximation was based on the evaluation of the value of the mean curvature energy of the surface, which depended on the particle material. The last approximation was based on the assumption that the van Oss and Berendsen technique could be used in order to calculate the surface tension of a planar surface in a liquid system, such as a simulated bulk fluid. The developed method yielded results that were in very good agreement
